by reading the long preamble of the treaty which sets forth the fact that these Indians had purchased with their own means, apprehending the accumulation of white people would compel them to seek other lands for their hunting grounds, right to live with the Menom by an arrangement with the United States, at a period anterior to 1838, this right, thus purchased by these Indians, was arranged, and the New York Indians were given five hundred thousand acres of land in the neighborhood of Green Bay. At the time the New York Indians obtained these five hundred thousand acres, they were in a wild country, comparatively valueless. Matters stood in this way until the lands at Green Bay became valuable and desirable for settlement. Then the United States, in 1838, made another treaty with these Indians, and gave them lands further west. In 1838, when the treaty was made their five hundred thousand acres of land in the neighborhood of Green Bay, would have old in the market for four times what the lands, which the Indians obtained for it, would have sold for. They exchanged at a great disadvantage, so far as value in the market was concerned, though, perhaps, the western lands were more useful to the Indians if they would have gone there. Thus the Indians paid for this interest; it was not a gift or gratuity by the

As I said before, this matter turns, to some extent, on the fact whether a formal notice, an appointment of a day that the Indians might understand that they must proceed to occupy this land or would lose their rights, has ever been given. According to my understanding-and that is the understanding of the commissioner who negotiated the treaty, and who is here-no such notice has ever been given and will, in the mean time, remark that the treaty does not say that the notice 1859. LAWRENCE 1859 given to the Indians to remove shall, at the same time, contain anything like a warning that if they do not go they shall forfeit their rights, because that notice is contained in the treaty to which they are a party. The treaty to which they are a party, says they shall go; and says if they do not go when notified, they shall forfeit their rights. They were notified time and sgain, and efforts made to get them to go. No other notice was re- In Babcock & Lykin's Brick Building, quired.

The only hope that I have now, is that when spring comes, we may find something to pay us in the mountains. Should we be so fortunate, I will immediately write you.
